I remember the first time I ever read the dictionary,
I thought it was a poem about everything.

Glossology is a set of lipograms: texts that avoid certain letters of the alphabet. Lipograms have a rich but sporadic history reaching back more than 2500 years, to the Greek hymns of Lasus of Hermione that left out sigma for sonic reasons. The most famous modern lipograms, Ernest Vincent Wright's Gadsby (1939) and Georges Perec's La Disparition (1969) also avoid the use of a single letter, E. The French literary group Oulipo — the Ouvroir de Littérature Potentielle, or workroom of potential literature — of which Perec is a member, champions lipograms as artistic tools, along with forms under a variety of other constraints.

Among more severely constrained lipograms, the best known are univocalics, which admit the use of only a single vowel. Perec's novella Les Revenentes (1970) has no vowel but E; Christian Bök's Eunoia (2001) has one chapter per vowel, each of which omits the other four (and Y) and aims to exhaust all usable words. Eunoia also contains the poem "Vowels," which allows only the letters in its title.

More restrictive examples do exist. Like many forms of constrained writing, lipograms blur into visual art and conceptual writing when hunted back to their most distant boundaries. Monica Aasprong's Soldatmarkedet (2003–) includes, among other works, a complete volume containing only the lowercase letter T, its pages an inundation of wordless text broken by narrow islands of whitespace.

Each poem in Glossology is a definition of a term that uses only the letters in the term itself. These are extreme cases: they admit between three and 11 letters, depending on the term they define, and therefore omit between 15 and 23 letters. My major sources of inspiration, as usual, are Bök's Eunoia and his earlier collection Crystallography (1994), masterpieces for which I'm eternally grateful. The seed for Glossology is the first poem in Crystallography, titled "Crystals": it defines crystals using only the letters C, R, Y, S, T, A, and L, arranged visually in the same pattern as some of the poems here, such as "Lightning" and "Icicles."
